

DORY LAMBERT KICKS.

The Self-Confessed Burglar Objects to Being Treated Out and Examined Like a Freak.

Theodore Lambert, now in the Camden county jail on a charge of murdering Cracker Baker William Kalrer, is complaining of the manner in which he is treated by the county officials. He says that since he made his first confession, nearly two weeks ago, he has been handcuffed and taken from his cell in the county jail to the Prosecutor's office three and four times a day and compelled to stand like a dime museum freak, while people "look him over."

Just as soon as he began to admit the many robberies charged against him, Lambert says he was compelled to go with a representative of the Prosecutor's office to a room and tell people where to go and find their goods. He was compelled to do this several times a day, he says.

Yesterday Lambert was taken from the jail to the room three times, and last night Assistant Prosecutor Ridgway again sent for him. After he was taken back to the jail last night Lambert told one of the jailers that he would not go out of the jail again until he left it to be tried.

"It's bad enough to be charged with murder," said he, "but when they take me for a farmer and a freak it's time I was making some complaint. But then," added the prisoner with a sarcastic smile, "it's so rare for the Prosecutor's officials to get a good thing that they don't know how to use it when they've got it."
